

After the “big egg” was cut open, the clean light air rose to form the blue sky high above; while the heavy and dusty air started to settle down to become the tremendously large piece of land called earth. From that day onward, the sky and the earth were separated.

From then onward, Pangu grew 10 feet a day and with his height increasing every day, the separation between the sky and the earth became further and further. Pangu was afraid that the sky would collapse and dared not move a bit from his position in supporting the sky.

Another 18,000 years had passed and thanks to Pangu, the sky and the earth were now separated by 90,000 miles. Pangu had also grown to a giant of 90,000 miles tall. At that time, the sky had reached its maximum height and could not rise any further, while the earth had also reached its final depth and could not be lower down any further. Finally, the sky and earth had reached a stable position.

Pangu had dedicated his whole body to the world and finally even his soul had turned into birds, beasts and fish to lend joy of life to the world.
